Chapter 395: Enlightenment in the Boundless Realm

A Journey Within

In the vast expanse of the Boundless Realm, Sung Jin-Woo embarked on a journey that was not of space or time, but of understanding. The infinite nature of the realm, with its paradoxical essence, became the perfect setting for his inner exploration. It was a place beyond thought, a space where the very concept of knowledge could be unbound from the limitations of the physical world.

As he wandered the boundless domain, he faced not enemies, nor challenges of might, but challenges of self. Every step he took brought him closer to a profound understanding of the universe and his place within it. Sung Jin-Woo delved deep within his own essence, breaking through the layers of his divine form to uncover the infinite potential that lay dormant within him.

The longer he stayed, the more he was able to perceive the intricate web of existence. Time was no longer linear. Space was no longer fixed. And even the concept of power became malleable, fluctuating like a vast sea that could be shaped by one's will.

With each passing moment, he understood the true nature of all things—the way they were born, how they were intertwined, and ultimately, how they faded into the infinite void. Sung Jin-Woo began to see the entirety of the multiverse not as a collection of distinct realms, but as a single, living entity, breathing and evolving, bound by neither the constraints of time nor the limits of space.

The Moment of Enlightenment

One day, after what seemed like an eternity in the Boundless Realm, Sung Jin-Woo felt a sudden shift—a realization that transcended all prior understanding. He had unlocked the ultimate secret: the true nature of existence was neither creation nor destruction, but balance. Everything in the multiverse existed because of balance—light and darkness, creation and annihilation, life and death.

The Divine Triad was not merely powerful because of their strength, but because they were in tune with this balance. They were the embodiment of this equilibrium, the perfect agents of the universe’s endless dance of creation and dissolution. Through this realization, Sung Jin-Woo felt a profound sense of peace—a sense that no matter how vast the universe became, no matter how powerful he became, the true purpose was not to dominate or rule, but to preserve and guide.

With his enlightenment complete, he understood that his journey was not one of constant growth or conquest, but of maintaining balance, understanding, and harmony. This new perception of the universe filled him with a profound sense of calm—he no longer needed to chase power, for he had already reached the highest level of understanding.

Return to the True Absolute One Domain Realm

After achieving this state of enlightenment, Sung Jin-Woo felt an irresistible pull—his connection to the True Absolute One Domain Realm, his true domain, called him back. The Boundless Realm, while infinite, had served its purpose. It had shown him the truth beyond the veil of existence. Now, he would return to where it all began, to where he could continue his duties—not as a ruler, but as a protector of balance, as the True Absolute One.

With a single thought, Sung Jin-Woo transported himself back to the True Absolute One Domain Realm.

The True Absolute One Domain Realm

The moment he arrived, the familiar landscape of his domain greeted him. The massive, ethereal throne stood at the center of the realm, radiating a divine light that reflected the vast power that resided within. Around him, the presence of his subjects—Ashborn, Sung Su-Ho, and the Nine Divine Dragons—felt the shift in the air. They could sense that Sung Jin-Woo had changed. His power was still unparalleled, but there was a subtle difference in his presence—a quiet serenity, as though he had transcended the need for further growth.

As he sat upon his throne, Sung Jin-Woo felt no hunger for power, nor the need to expand his reach. His enlightenment had shown him that his role was not one of endless domination, but of guiding the multiverse toward an eternal balance. The essence of all creation and destruction, of life and death, flowed through him, and he understood that the true measure of strength was not in how much one could control, but in how much one could protect and preserve.

The Divine Triad and Beyond

Sung Jin-Woo now sat in his throne, surrounded by the essence of the multiverse. Ashborn, Sung Su-Ho, and the Nine Divine Dragons approached him, sensing the change in their lord. They knew that their journey together was far from over, but the path ahead would be one of understanding, not of endless conflict.

The divine realms were at peace, for now. And the universe, though vast and full of mysteries, was guided by the eternal balance that Sung Jin-Woo had come to understand. The future of the multiverse was not a matter of might—it was a matter of wisdom, of preservation, and of balance.

As the True Absolute One, Sung Jin-Woo was more than just a ruler. He was the embodiment of harmony, and with that understanding, the True Absolute One Domain Realm would continue to thrive. The multiverse would evolve, but now it would do so in the presence of the greatest of gods—who, having achieved enlightenment, no longer sought to conquer, but to guide.

And so, with the infinite horizon ahead of him, Sung Jin-Woo began his new journey—not as the ruler of all, but as the eternal protector of balance.
